Market Commentary

October 2024 faced greater uncertainty than normal, and markets swayed on every US election poll result. While not delivering fireworks, global equity markets could not maintain their 5-month run of positive returns, falling more than 2% in US dollar terms over the month. For unhedged New Zealand investors however, it was a great month, with the MSCI All Countries World Index rising 4.51% (NZD, unhedged). This was helped by the NZ dollar's fall from 0.635 to 0.597 over the month, or in inverse terms, the US dollar gaining more than 6% against the NZ dollar. US equities, which represent 65% of the global benchmark, lead the charge with a gain of more than 6% (NZD), while emerging markets lagged, returning 2.3%. Global equity market performance was shaped by a combination of macroeconomic, geopolitical, and sector-specific factors. A key driver was central bank policy, particularly the US Federal Reserve's recent interest rate cuts, which sparked optimism for economic stability and growth. Geopolitical events also influenced markets, particularly the conflict in the Middle East, which created fluctuations in energy prices and heightened market volatility. Concerns over potential supply chain disruptions from this region added to investor caution, as did the continued challenges in China's property sector and uneven recovery. Despite these risks, emerging markets such as India benefitted from high demand in technology sectors like semiconductors, providing some counterbalance to the negative impacts on global equity performance from other emerging regions.

Fund Commentary

In October, the fund returned 6.13% (gross of fees), outperforming the benchmark return of 4.51% by 162 basis points (bps). The underlying managers delivered strong performance over the month; with growth manager WCM leading the way. Stock selection was especially strong in the information technology, industrials, consumer discretionary and healthcare sectors. However, it detracted in the communication services and consumer staples sectors. AppLovin Corp, a leading ad network and mediation platform company, was the fund's top performer in October, returning 38.7% following very strong Q3 results. AppLovin uses its Al-powered AXON and AppDiscovery ad recommendation platforms to help businesses of every size connect to their ideal customers, enabling them to reach, monetize and expand their global audiences. Two of the fund's semiconductor companies, Nvidia and Taiwan Semiconductor (TSMC), posted double-digit gains over the month, driven by announcements by several companies in the industry planning significant expansions to their Al-infrastructure-related spending. This is expected to result in strong demand growth for Nvidia's world leading GPUs, and for TSMC's chips. Delta Airlines was another top performer - its shares rallied 20% to their highest level since February 2020. This was in response to a sharp decline in crude oil prices, which dropped more than 6% after Israeli airstrikes on Iranian military installations avoided Iran's oil infrastructure, thereby averting a broader energy supply crisis. The fund's top detractors from performance were primarily nil exposure or underweights to companies which performed well, for example, Alphabet Class C, JP Morgan Chase, Apple Inc. and Alphabet Class A. The overweight position in luxury goods company LVHM (held by Royal London and JP Morgan) was the exception, its share price fell almost 8% over the month, partly due to headwinds from China, which accounts for more than 20% of the luxury industry's revenues.
